Gaining Some Experience of Coaching

Decisions are a key component of the work place. Whatever your role, you are responsible for making decisions that will have an impact upon how others work with you and how they can perform their jobs.

Whether it was to say “no” to a task that you have been allocated or whether you chose not to say something at a meeting. At times, we are aware that some of the choices that we make are not as good as they could have been and we should have made better decisions.

This practical activity is about coaching someone to help them to analyse how they go about making their decisions – what motivates them, the emotions that drive their decisions, the impact that their decisions have on them and on others, and ways to improve their decision making.

It focuses on understanding which decisions would benefit from a more considered and reflective approach and which decisions would benefit from a quicker decision.

Even if you are an experienced coach, complete the activity as it will help you to reassess your coaching skills and capabilities.

To work with this activity, you need to seek the agreement of another person to coach them. This will help them to get a better understanding of what happens when they make decisions AND it will help you to practice, develop and build your coaching capabilities.

Before meeting your coachee, ask them to record critical decisions for an agreed period of time, such as a week. It is important for you to define and agree what is a critical decision and what they will record (to stop them from recording everything!).

Your coachee should record the situation, the decision that they made, their initial response, their final decision, and whether they changed the decision later. Finally, was it the right decision?

Describe the situation

What was your initial response?

What decision did you make?

What was your final decision?

Did you change your decision?

Was it the right decision?

At the coaching session, work with the coachee so that they analyse the data that they have collected. (Remember, not to direct them but to ask them questions about what they can deduce.)

Using the GROW model, coach them around their decision making using the issue(s) that they highlight.

What GOALS do they want to set for themselves?

What is the REALITY of the situation?

What OPTIONS are open to them?

WILL they commit to taking the necessary action?

This activity is about what you learnt about yourself and your coaching capabilities so think about what you found out by coaching someone around their decision making.

How easy was it to be non-directive?

Was it tempting to offer your own ideas and solutions at times?

How did you find working with the structure of the GROW model?
